So, I drew a diagram of a possible way of thinking about the sex/gender distinction/relation...

Wonder if anyone has thoughts?

I know the bimodal personality distribution is controversial. But I have been thinking... firstly, absolute blank slatism seems untenable to me; secondly, if we are happy to accept phrases like 'feminine men,' and especially given the arguments we are making about the link between being GNC and homosexuality (which is key to claims we're making about issues with transing kids), then it seems we are accepting that there is something meaningfully understood as 'femininity' at a personality level... which is somewhat distinct from, but interacts with,
