Another Play-for-Today.

Academic DudeBros Hate JKRowling II

This one teaches history, as we'll see, he knows ALL about gender from the classes that he teaches, and he's VERY big on empathy. Except for women.

Hook nosed goblins. Burn the witch!!!!

Threatening women with rape and baseball bats. RIGHT SIDE OF HISTORY!!!

Man: I didn't condone violence against women. I just fixated on these terrible things this transphobe has done while completely ignoring that the movement screaming about her transphobia regularly threatens women with violence.

Also, let me tell you how trans rights don't interfere with your rights while putting my fingers in my ears and going lalala while you explain otherwise.

By way of final flourish I will ridiculously assert that no one ever illegitimately encroaches on other people's rights.

You can stand up to violence against women without denying trans people the right to be who they believe themselves to be. Your right not to be threatened or attacked is not contingent on trans people not being equal

I am female. I am human. An adult female human is called a woman. It's not a gender category. The gendered idea of 'woman' is *how* women are oppressed. If you insist I redefine myself on the basis of the mechanism by which I am oppressed you are harming me.

Scene 5.

Woman: Don't be ridiculous dude. All instances of colonisation are cases in which someone illegitimately encroaches on someone else's rights.

What's happening here is appropriation, and it's interesting that you don't see that, b/c it's kind of central to patriarchy.

rather than being a structural analogy.

This is of some significance here. The left readily accepts that people are allowed boundaries. But just not women.

This is an interesting point.

Structurally, what the trans rights movement is doing is equivalent to the appropriative mechanisms of an act of colonisation.

That's not to say it's morally equivalent to an act of actual territorial appropriation and all the horror it involves.

HOWEVER. What interests me is that the left is currently in the grip of an almost totalising queerified 'no boundaries' discourse, complete with analogies to how all boundaries are like racism etc (apparently its fine for them to use the analogy there. Or at least, they are in the grip of that discourse when it suits them - when they want to coerce women's boundaries, or when people try to pout up pretty much any sexual boundaries at all.

*At the same time*, the left also has a discourse about colonisation and appropriation, which is actually a

They don't believe that *all* people who assert rights over something being taken from them are oppressors.

Rather, it's that you are only allowed to assert that right *if* the left has *already* decided you are then oppressed not the oppressor.*

This is how centrally the distortion of intersectional discourse is to trans activism. Because it is only by positioning women as the oppressor that the defence of their boundaries can be framed as an act of sovereigntist segregation and not as resistance to appropriation.

I do not in any way want to handwave the way women are implicated in perpetuating racial oppression.

However, I also need to point out how this discourse is being weaponised, *by males,* in order to justify the violation of women's boundaries.

As dude infers here, I'm a white woman, and so I don't get to complain about being appropriated and should just STFU. (HE TEACHES FEMINISM!!!!)

How fucking convenient for white males.
